

CPI Responds to Reports of Rejections from Local Recycling Collections

Following several articles about the increase in rejections from local authority collections, CPI's Director of Raw Materials, Simon Weston, has offered some comment as this is a matter that directly concerns members of CPI.

He says: "Reports of higher reject rates from recycled materials partially reflects a growing impatience amongst paper mills that cannot afford to pick up the cost of contamination. Increasing energy, water, sorting and waste disposal costs have focused reprocessors on the impact of poor quality, which can increase the cost of raw material by up to three times by the time it has been processed.

"The paper industry favours a clear and consistent approach to collection, such as that being advocated by WRAP, which would provide clarity and simplicity for councils and the public. It also believes that the increasing use of comingled collection has contributed to confusion because it encourages the idea that "anything goes" in the recycling bin, rather than forcing the public to focus on the specifics of what they are doing."
